World Wide Views on Global Warming

As Danish Minister of Climate and Energy I strongly support and recommend the global project 'World Wide Views on Global Warming'.

I have joined the project as Ambassador for the project because of my wish to contribute to the success of this globally important and unique citizen consultation.

If we want to reach climate solutions at international level it is important not only to improve the attention of citizens around the globe about the climate problems and the possible solutions. It is also imperative to receive feedback to the political level about the considerations of the citizens and about their own commitment to contribute to the solutions.

World Wide Views on Global Warming will be a historic example of citizen consultation across the world. The theme of global warming deserves such an activity, since global warming and climate policies will involve any citizen on the globe.

As Climate and Energy Minister of the host country of the UN Climate Conference (COP 15) in December 2009 I do think that the voices of citizens around the globe should be listened to in the global policy-making on climate. Living conditions in the future will depend on the solutions, decisions and commitment made today – internationally, nationally, locally as well as by the individual citizen.

I hope that institutions, organisations and individuals all over the world will join forces with the organisers, the partners and the ambassadors of the project in making the World Wide Views on Global Warming a truly global activity.

Sincerely,

Connie Hedegaard
